Supplement:	No
Hiring Supervisor:	Ed Caplis
Closing Date:	December 15, 2006

Special Information: This is a temporary position. The successful applicant will start immediately upon hire. The position is expected to end April 28, 2007. The work schedule is Monday through Saturday and typically exceeds 8 hours a day.

Role Summary and Duties: Incumbents are responsible for tax policy analysis, general economic research. Work ranges from analyzing and providing relevant implications and impacts for state tax policy stemming from changes in federal tax policy, and maintaining critical databases and simulation models requisite to achieving department/legislative goals; to developing tax policy and revenue proposals that address executive program objectives. This includes providing expert testimony on selected tax policy issues. Primary contacts are with department leadership, federal and state agency representatives, Governor’s Budget Office, Office of Legal Affairs staff, legislators, legislative staff, business and professional organizations, and local government representatives.

This position is responsible for general and wide-ranging research and analysis relating to taxation issues. Job duties and work responsibilities may include, but are not limited to: developing statistical and econometric models, methodologies, and other approaches for use in analyzing a variety of tax policy issues; estimation of the economic and fiscal impact of a wide variety of proposed state and federal tax legislation or changes to current law taxes and tax structure; participation in the development of tax-related legislation; gathering and dissemination of relevant data for analyses and reporting purposes; development of strategic policies and plans; preparation of responses to miscellaneous surveys, taxpayer inquiries; etc.

Competencies: The holder of this position should have a sound understanding and basic knowledge of economic principles, including the relationship between tax policy and economic development; the interrelationships between federal, state, and local systems of taxation in Montana; the fundamental principles of tax fairness, including benefit and ability-to-pay principles; the general nature and character of income, property, and sales taxation; and the concepts of tax incidence and tax burden. Skills in the use of mainframe and personal computers are requisite for this position. This position also requires experience in SAS computer programming for personal computers, and familiarity with personal computer software, including WINDOWS, EXCEL and WORD. Power Point or other graphics packages, or similar software often is essential to the successful completion of work projects in this position. The holder of this position must have the ability to independently analyze the nature of work projects assigned, determine the appropriate model or analytical approach to completing the work project, gather all information necessary to complete the project, and present the conclusions or results of the projects and studies in a clear and concise manner. The ability to write comprehensive reports in a coherent manner and at levels intended for a wide variety of audiences is essential to this position. The holder of this position should also be able to demonstrate effective oral presentation skills, and be able to work effectively with other staff members in a small team environment.

Education and Experience: The knowledge, skills, and abilities necessary for this position are typically acquired through the completion of a master's degree in economics with an emphasis on econometrics, statistics or a closely related field of study. The experience of working directly within a tax policy and/or economic research office, or work experience that is very closely related to this type of work experience, would also contribute to the knowledge, skills, and abilities necessary for this position.
